"Micro-Teaching" Used In Training Jr. FFA Officers

A new teaching method called "Micro-teaching" is presently being used by the Appomattox Intermediate School vocational agriculture department to assist in training Jr. FFA officers.

The new method functions in the following manner: Jr. FFA meetings are video taped (similar to a tape recorder) capturing both sound and picture of FFA officers in action. Later, back in the classroom, officers and other program participants study their performance over TV with their chapter advisors. Criticisms are made, usually by the officers themselves, and ways to improve each officer are discussed.

Vo-Ag instructor Dennis Torrence states: "The video tape equipment is a tremendous teaching tool for training FFA officers. This equipment is just another aid that our county teachers are using to prepare our young people to meet the challenges that they will faces the future leaders of our country."

Jr. FFA meetings are video taped, Here Mr. W. T. Johnson captures a slide presentation of the past years work in FFA being narrated by Al Johnson and Mark Scott. Note slide projection in upper left of picture.

Later the entire FFA meeting is reviewed by chapter officers and other participants on the program. Pictured are Dwight Lampkin, Mark Eggleston and Eddie Stratton in the classroom studying their performance on the TV monitor.
